

Generation Z Podcast

by David Belle

With the creation and democratization of social networks, society as we know it has undergone an irreversible change. It all began with Generation Z, who grew up with these tools and now face numerous problems that hinder the sharing of culture as we know it. Indeed, in the age of social networks and the culture of self-perpetuation, our society feels more than ever like a place where only oneself counts-

Likes, followers, and other concepts make us forget the primary purpose of these tools: sharing culture. Thanks to the internet and Google Translate, for example, people can communicate online and share different culture.

However, although our voices now reach across the globe, our ears remain plugged. The anonymity provided by social networks gives some people the courage to make inappropriate remarks or behave inappropriately. So, the purpose of my speech today is to remind everyone that culture is knowledge that is transmitted and shared, and that the individualism of our society should not prevent us from trying to share this culture.
